An institution is as truly a living organism as is a plant or an animal. It germinates, flourishes, or decays as do the ideas, sentiments, and desires of which it is the outward expression. Its phases of growth conform to natural and ascertainable laws; and the teacher of history does well when he constructs the major part of his curriculum on the solid basis of political organizations. Here, at any rate, his method may be rigidly scientific. What he loses in breadth, if indeed he lose anything, is more than counterbalanced by depth and precision. Social embryology and animal embryology present similar phenomena to the observer. And, while the naturalist necessarily treats his subject from the historical point of view, the student of comparative institutions is more and more inclined to ascribe to his branch the character of a biological science. But while political institutions are beginning very properly to occupy a large space in the university life, there are organisms of a different nature whose history is scarcely less interesting or instructive. Among these not the least noteworthy is the university itself: a noble product of social advancement, designed at once for the cultivation of the intellect and for the expansion of the boundaries of knowledge.
