Excerpt: .to her as a mark of the highest honor. To obtain this token of approbation, and thus prove to her father that she did-not undervalue his kindness, had been her one great aim through the entire term. She had chosen this hour when she would be entirely free from interruption; and now with her port folio on a small table by her side, her pen-caught the inspiration of genius, and wholly unaware of the flight of time, dashed on through one sheet and another until her small clock struck the hour eleven. She started from her seat, saying to herself with a sigh of relief: Iliad no idea it was so late. One hour more, and I could have finished it. Then shutting the portfolio with almost a loving grasp, she was pushing back the table when she was startled by a low groan. What can that be? she murmured, listening intently. Then she remembered she had heard a similar sound at intervals ever since she had been writing. Somebody is in distress. I will go down. I will wake Nancy. Again she heard a groan, and summoning all her courage, determined to wait for no one, but run and proffer relief at once. She pushed back the bolt, shading the light from the wind with her hand, and gazed out into the darkness Who is it? she asked in a trembling voice. Can I help you? The groans ceased, and a feeble voice...
